Daily Market Report

- Gold (XAU/USD) faces renewed selling pressure on Tuesday, retracing a significant portion of the previous day's rebound from tariff-driven volatility.
- The precious metal trades below its monthly peak but remain supported above the $5,150 level during the European session, indicating limited follow-through selling.
- A modest recovery in the US Dollar (USD), backed by the Federal Reserve's relatively hawkish stance, exerts downward pressure on the non-yielding assets.
- Minutes from the January FOMC meeting revealed that several policymakers prefer to hold off on further rate cuts until disinflation progress is clearly re-established.
- Fed Governor Christopher Waller suggested rates could remain unchanged in March if upcoming labor market data signals improved economic stability.
- Despite hawkish signals, markets continue to price in three 25-basis-point rate cuts this year, which helps cap deeper losses in Gold.
- Stabilization in global equity markets reduces immediate safe-haven demand, contributing to the intraday pullback in Gold.
- Ongoing geopolitical tensions, including risks of Middle East conflict ahead of US-Iran nuclear talks, provide underlying support to the safe-haven metal.
- Traders now await key US macroeconomic releases and speeches from FOMC officials for fresh directional cues on the XAU/USD pair.
